He also shows that the present system, though possessing the features of educating and civilizing the Indians is still incomplete and in need of great improvement. As to the unlawful enclosure of the plan to incorporate the Indian tribes into our political and social system.

is very denunciatory, and he says that, "Whatever appliances, however, the law has placed in the hands of the Executive will hereafter be invoked, if necessary, to put a final end to this enormous plundering of the public domain."

The Reform statesmen lay out the following schedule for Congress: Strike off needless taxes. Restore the currency to a fair basis.

Ism, that is born of monarchical oppression, and any time, or under any circumstation. They want the debt question settled, and that as speedily as possible, but they will never consent to resort to this base alternative. They would not if they would, and they could not if they would not if they would. Even now, the mere suggestion of it, is offensive to a great majority of the taxpayers; but if it was formulated into a distinct proposition, and after full discussion, submitted to the voters for action, they would repudiate it with that unanimity its meanness would so richly deserve.

Take Southwest Virginia for instance for illustration. It was here that readjustment had its stronghold, it was here that the measure found its most numerous and adroit advocates.

SPECIAL AND PERSONAL.

On arriving in Washington Mr. Hewitt reiterates his views on the necessity for tariff reform, and thinks that Mr. Morrison's defeat was a misfortune.

this does not imply, by any manner of means, that any considerable number of them are wil-ling to resort to open and direct repudiation

It was from the able representative of one of its wealthiest counties that the proposition to repeal the original funding bill emanated. It was here that many of the wealthiest seal estate owners in the State resided. It was here, in this agricultural community, remote from the markets of the world, with high assessments upon their lands, and low prices for their products, that the payment of taxes bore most heavily. And yet in the face of all these facts it would be found difficult to muster up a corporal's guard, in all this section, in favor of the repudiation of the State debt. Neither now, nor at any time inscenter, will they ever agree to pay one cent less than they honestly think the bondholders are entitled to receive. And, as with them, so we believe it will be found in all the remaining parts of the State.
